Neural control of behavior in knifefish. Many of our investigations relate to the question of how the central nervous system controls behavior. To address this question, we have conducted cell biological, neuroanatomical, neuroendocrinological, and behavioral studies. At the behavioral level, we have focused on a well-defined behavioral pattern exhibited by some weakly electric gymnotiform fish.

Neural circuits of behaviour. Animals often need to take risky decisions to maximize survival chances. How neural circuits in the brain compute risk and reward is a major question in neuroscience.” KEVIN STARAS Professor of Neuroscience. To ensure survival, an animal must adaptively select, and then generate, appropriate and often complex behaviours.

The insular cortex, orbitofrontal cortex, nucleus accumbens, amygdala, and dopaminergic ventral tegmental area neurons have a key role in control of feeding behavior in response to the reward or hedonic aspects of food. Over the past several years, there has been extensive research on the mechanisms controlling food intake and energy metabolism. Studies in experimental animals and functional neuroimaging studies in humans have provided insight into the complex interactions between the ...
