The use of the byname 'Canadian' is the result of misinterpretations during the development of the sport of canoeing in the 19th century when an open touring canoe was called 'Canadian canoe' from the so called Canadian style canoe from Canada, the then more or less 'approved' open touring canoe by the American Canoe Association (ACA), as opposed to the wood-and-canvas touring canoe from Maine in the United States that was not officially recognized by the ACA until 1934.

Canadian (canoe) - Wikipedia

In British English, the term "canoe" can also refer to a kayak, while canoes are then called Canadian or open canoes to distinguish them from kayaks. Canoes are widely used for competition and pleasure, such as racing, whitewater, touring and camping, freestyle and general recreation. Canoeing has been part of the Olympics since 1936.

Canoe - Wikipedia

The most common form of material used on Old Town Canadian canoes, Three Layer Polyethylene is a sandwich of closed cell foam surrounded by layers of high density polyethylene. These canoes are stronger and more durable than single layer thermoformed canoes. They are also better through the water and more inherently buoyant.
