Abstract. Bertolt Brecht's encounter with the American political theater in 1935 points us to a profound aesthetic discrepancy at the heart of political theater by revealing the existence of a vital, non-modernist tradition of articulating a leftist cultural critique. Theatre Union's adaptation of his epic drama The Mother evinces the characteristics that were typical for many New Deal productions and can therefore be considered emblematic of the predominant leftist aesthetics of the time.

Although he tried hard to become established in the United States, Brecht failed to make a breakthrough either as a scriptwriter in Hollywood, California, or as a playwright on Broadway. Two years later he moved to East Berlin and remained there until his death.
