Archaeology. It's a well kept secret, but Shetland is a Treasure Trove for Archaeology. It has been home to people for over 6000 years. There may have been no indigenous mammals but the sea has been a rich larder throughout time. The earliest known site, a settlement at West Voe, is situated beside the shore.

Shetland's rich archaeological landscape is a historian's dream. The fact that the islands have never been heavily populated or intensively farmed means that many sites have survived that, in other circumstances, might have been lost. Some of the archaeology in Shetland is extensive but very subtle, such as ancient field boundaries.

Shetland's archaeology is relatively recent – discoveries span from Neolithic (4000 B.C.) through Iron Age and Viking into Medieval. (A.D. 1500) The collection consists of site excavations and stray finds. It takes in all elements, from domestic, farming, fishing and religion. Most are routine everyday objects, showing that Shetland was never a centre of power and wealth.
