When the camera tilts, it pivots up and down. Tilting is commonly used to look over tall objects such as a cathedral or an office building. To conceptualize a Tilt, stare straight ahead and pivot your head to look up and down. Like the Pan, this technique is used within a scene to follow characters in motion — known as re-framing the shot.

The position your head is in at set up is commonly overlooked by most beginner and club golfers. It could be the difference between you hitting a solid iron or a thinned one over the back of the green. At set up the head should be pointing behind the golf ball on a slight angle away from the target. (see image right at the top).

First, if you have a camera remote, single shot is the ideal drive mode. If you don't have a camera remote, use your camera's self-timer. Set a timer of at least 2-3 seconds, that way any vibrations you cause by pressing the shutter button will dissipate by the time the shutter fires.

Best Camera Settings for Landscape Photography

1. Stand 4-5 feet away from the ball, directly behind it, and trace an imaginary line from the target back to the ball. It's imperative that you stand behind the ball to see this line. Trying to do it while standing in the address position will create an optical illusion and almost always, result in poor alignment.
