Number of nozzle holes significantly changes the transient needle behavior. • Near-nozzle flow characteristics are highly affected by the hole arrangement. • Multi-hole nozzles generate turbulent initial flow with faster mixing at downstream.

The fewer nozzle holes lead to more concentrated diesel distribution and larger orifice diameters result in poor fuel atomization, thus the diesel/air mixing was slowed down with fewer nozzle holes. As the combustion process of diesel engines are mainly controlled by fuel/air mixing, the reduced diesel/air mixing rate results in retarded ignition and decreased peak pressure.

Abstract. Despite the fact that all modern diesel engines use multi-hole injectors, single-hole injectors are frequently used to understand the fundamental properties of high-pressure diesel injections due to their axisymmetric design of the injector nozzles. A multi-hole injector accommodates many holes around the nozzle axis to deliver adequate amount of fuel with small orifices.

Abstract. Increasing the injection pressure and downsizing the nozzle orifice diameter have been major measures for diesel engines to facilitate fuel-ambient gas mixture formation and combustion processes. The objective of this investigation is to carry out a quantitative analysis on the effects of micro-hole nozzle and ultra-high injection pressure on the mixing and combustion characteristics of diesel spray flame.

The effect of using a split fuel injection strategy on the spray atomization was analysed using a grouped-hole nozzle with 12 holes. The time-based injection rate profiles for a biodiesel fuel, i.e. the mass flowrate of the fuel injector nozzle were obtained from the pressure variation generated when the fuel was injected into a tube filled with fuel.

Compared with the cylindrical hole configuration, trenches are able to provide a higher global cooling effectiveness, but a larger amount of coolant injection is required. The introduction of both trenches is responsible for a secondary thermodynamic loss increase of about 0.7% at low coolant injection rates.
