The ambiguities of Eysenck's personal biography before coming to the UK from Berlin in 1935, the frequent charges against him of manipulating or overinterpreting his (or rather his students') data, his inflammatory entry into the race/IQ controversy, his acceptance of large sums of money from the tobacco industry for research aimed at circumventing the link between smoking and cancer, all find their place in Buchanan's distinctly non-hagiographical account.

Eysenck (1991) suggested personality is critical to understanding the nature of tobacco use status. Lynch (1995) proposed that the failure of anti-tobacco use programs may have been inevitable by not considering intrinsic psychological factors due to the prevailing assumptions that young adults are driven solely by extrinsic and social factors when choosing to smoke or not to smoke.
