Environmental Culture: The Ecological Crisis of Reason ...

In its fullest meaning, developing environmental culture involves a systematic resolution of the nature/culture and reason/nature dualisms that split mind from body, reason from emotion, across their many domains of cultural influence. The ecological crisis requires from us a new kind of culture because a major factor in its development has been the rationalist culture and the associated human/nature dualism characteristic of the west.

The Environmental Crisis: Culture, Power and the Possibility of Change. Public discourse on responding to environmental crisis continues to stress individual action, on the one hand, or on the other hand either references to governmental actions or to a generalised target: 'humanity'. It continues to be assumed that accumulating and disseminating knowledge is key to policy change, notwithstanding decades of questionable results accruing from knowledge-centred campaigns.
