Justifying Intellectual Property Rights. Three main justifications offered for intellectual property rights (IPRs) are: reward for labour (John Locke), personality-based (GWF Hegel) and incentive-oriented (Jeremy Bentham/Utilitarian) theories. The reward for labour and personality theories are from the deontological/normative school of thought, while the incentive-oriented theory is from the consequentialist school of thought.

JUSTIFYING INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY Within Stoicism, four things were said to be incorporeal: time, space, the void and lekta(the meaning of words or sentences).20That the Stoics should have had the category at all is at first sight surprising, given that theirs was a philosophy of uncompromising materialism.

Justifying Intellectual Property: Back to the Beginning

In contrast to much of the work in this area, however, Justifying Intellectual Property does not build its case solely on economic or utilitarian grounds. Instead, the author attempts to make the ethical case for IP, arguing that these rights run deeper and are more fundamental than the conventional view of IP rights as policy tools to spur innovation.

Organised by: Oxford Intellectual Property Research Centre. (A Talk, based on the just-published book of the same name; Harvard University Press, June 2011) Justifying Intellectual Property establishes a sophisticated and balanced rationale for the most vital form of modern property, IP rights. This book answers the many critics who contend that these rights are inefficient, unfair, and theoretically incoherent.

Justifying Intellectual Property | Oxford Law Faculty

At the outset, it is important to distinguish the general issue of whether intellectual property is justified from the more specific issue of whether a particular body of intellectual property law (e.g., copyright law in the U.S.) is justified. Obviously, a particular body of law protecting intellectual property will not be justified if intellectual property protection is, as a general matter, unjustified, but the converse is not true.
