Thucydides on the Causes of Athenian Imperialism

In 432 B.C., as the Corinthians attempt to galvanize Sparta into declaring war against Athens for siding with their Corcyraean enemies, they accordingly accuse the Lacedaemons of being inclined to “attempt less than is justified by your power,” and that they suffer from “a total want of invention.”[7] As if to cement this moderation, Thucydides then allows the king to agree, but in a more positive light.

It is likely that Thucydides inserted the Athenian view on Sparta and its way of life, which was Abstract. Thucydides's work has remained fragmentary. As early as Chapter 2.65 he offers a summing up of his opinion about the war. Athens' steady rise and subsequent dominance as a Greek power leading up to the commencement of the Peloponnesian War is described by Thucydides through the events of the Pentecontaetia; a period that saw the steady advancement of the Athenian empire around the Mediterranean. Anticipating the fear this rise in power would generate in her enemies, Athens engaged her entire population in the construction of a wall around the city, and the construction of a secondary walled corridor between ...

The Nature of Strategy: Pericles and the Peloponnesian War

This dynamic is most clearly articulated when Thucydides states that “the growth of the power of
