Fully integrated systems should consider insight from all the sources available to them – patient and public engagement, patient experience, quality improvement – as part of their continuous conversations with their population. Every conversation is an opportunity for a system to learn, but they must want to listen.

Joined-up listening: integrated care and patient insight ...

We selected indicators which address each of these aspects of integrated care, and used them to follow a patient's journey from home, into hospital, and back. The indicators use data from a variety of sources, including surveys of patients and carers, Hospital Episode Statistics and NHS Digital data.

Are patients benefitting from better integrated care ...

Patients and carers are feeling less supported and less involved in their care, and there are important variations between different groups of patients. However, the NHS is managing to keep the rate at which people are admitted to hospital with conditions that should be managed in the community relatively steady, despite a large growth in the number of admissions.
