The 17 th philosopher Thomas Hobbes believed that, without a civilising authority, humankind is condemned to live in a state of nature, where there is war of all against all and life is nasty, brutish and short. In his book Leviathan, Hobbes proposed that there was a profound drive, or law of nature, to escape this fate:

The creature glared at me, its eyes strangely shifting between blinks from black to the ice blue, with a round widening pupil probing me for some kind of psychic weakness. I could feel it reaching out, attempting to assault my mind with accusations and condemnation. The voices were guttural and muted like sounds heard through deep water.
