This chapter examines non-linear time series models in relation to the Bayesian inference approach in econometric analysis. There are two types of models which are quite different for the treatment of inference. The first class of models corresponds to models with a threshold while the second class has been advocated as a reasonable approximation to the disequilibrium models proposed in 1974 by Maddala and Nelson.

We shall describe (i) the threshold model and (ii) the (generalized) autoregressive conditional heteroscedasticity model, or in short the TAR model and the (G)ARCH model respectively. The former was introduced by Tong in 1977 and developed systematically in Tong and Lim (1980) and Tong (1983, 1990), and the latter by Engle (1982), later generalized by Bollerslev (1986).

Nonlinear moving average model. In the nonlinear moving average model of order q, denoted as NLMA (q), the current value of the time series, yt, is a nonlinear function known as h (.) of the q past innovations { εt−1, ⋯, εt−q } and the current innovation εt. This is: (1) y t = ε t + h (ε t − 1, ⋯, ε t − q; θ), t = 1,2,3, where θ represents the parameters vector of function h (.) and y {εt } is a sequence of independent random variables which are identically ...

The simplest way of modelling a nonlinear relationship is to transform the forecast variable y y and/or the predictor variable x x before estimating a regression model. While this provides a non- linear functional form, the model is still linear in the parameters. The most commonly used transformation is the (natural) logarithm (see Section 3.2).

Among other types of non-linear time series models, there are models to represent the changes of variance over time (heteroskedasticity). These models represent autoregressive conditional heteroskedasticity (ARCH) and the collection comprises a wide variety of representation (GARCH, TARCH, EGARCH, FIGARCH, CGARCH, etc.). Here changes in variability are related to, or predicted by, recent past values of the observed series.
