In the case of plantations like Whitney and McLeod, there are still numerous living people who remember life on these plantations. Across the plantation South, African-American workers—many of them descended from enslaved people who worked the same land—did not leave plantations in large numbers until the Second Great Migration in the 1950s and 1960s.

Life on a Southern Plantation, 1854 - Eyewitness to History

Although plantations were designed for work, they quickly became critical locations for the family and social life of enslaved people. Africans landed from the slave ships were overwhelmingly alone. Some arrived on a plantation in the company of 'shipmates' or with Africans from their native region in Africa, but they did not come there as families.

Plantation & Slavery History. As wealthy South Carolinians rushed to carve out rice plantations along tidal rivers, those who knew the art of growing rice were brought in from the African countries where rice growing was commonplace. The tediousness of the process, the dangers of its cultivation in swamp-like conditions, and the various untoward circumstances such as hurricanes or invasion by ricebirds, made the rice extremely difficult to produce.

This is a list of plantations and pens in Jamaica by county and parish including historic parishes that have since been merged with modern parishes. Plantations produced crops, such as sugar cane and coffee, whilst livestock pens produced animals for labour on plantations and for consumption. Both industries used the forced labour of enslaved peoples. James Robertson's map of Jamaica, published in 1804 based on a survey of 1796-99, identified 814 sugar plantations and around 2,500 pens or non-su
