Free Oracle Wait

The free buffer wait is an Oracle metric that has generally been considered to be related to the database writer (DBWR). Generally, the free buffer wait event indicates that dirty blocks are not being cleared fast enough by the DBWR and some server process is reporting that it is unable to find a free buffer. This results in a free buffer wait.

Oracle Free Buffer Waits

Before a block is read into the buffer cache, an Oracle process must find and get a free buffer for the block. Sessions wait on the free buffer waits event when they are unable to find a free buffer on the LRU list or when all buffer gets are suspended. The DBWR process is responsible for making clean buffers on the LRU lists.

Understanding Oracle Free Buffer Wait Events

This event occurs mainly when a server process is trying to read a new buffer into the buffer cache but too many buffers are either pinned or dirty and thus unavailable for reuse. The session posts to DBWR then waits for DBWR to create free buffers by writing out dirty buffers to disk.

Free buffer waits (%) - Oracle

The process is waiting on an oracle enqueue (a lock you can see in v$lock). This commonly occurs when one user is trying to update a row in a table that is currently being updated by another user. The blockers can be found out by using following query select * from dba_waiters

Oracle Wait Events That Everyone Should Know - Techgoeasy

Every Oracle wait event belongs to a specific wait event class. Oracle groups wait events into classes, such as Administrative, Application, Cluster, Commit, Concurrency, Configuration, Scheduler, System I/O, and User I/O, to facilitate the analysis of wait events. Here are the characteristics of typical waits in some of these wait classes:

Wheel of Wisdom Oracle - Spirit Navigator

Description A latch is a low-level internal lock used by Oracle to protect memory structures. Latches are similar to short duration locks that protect critical bits of code. This wait indicates that the process is waiting for a latch that is currently busy (held by another process).

Latch free - other (%) - Oracle

you were waiting for a latch to become free - latch free. Basically it means some session needed a latch (on the library cache for example to parse some SQL). it tried to get the latch, but failed (because someone else had it). So, it goes to sleep (waits on a latch free) and wakes up and tries again.

About latch wait time - Ask TOM - Oracle

The free buffer waits (fbwait) were spread evenly across just 24 adjacent sets of the entire list – and a quick check of v$buffer_pool showed that those working data sets made up the recycle cache. So, one step closer to the understanding the problem, I asked the client which objects had storage clauses that assigned them to the recycle cache.

Many of these wait events are tied to the internal implementation of Oracle and therefore are subject to change or deletion without notice. Application developers should be aware of this and write their code to tolerate missing or extra wait events.

Oracle Wait Events

The publisher is responsible for moving the message to the free queue, but it cannot do so until the message is in the done queue. If the message is still not in the done queue, process enters this wait. This wait event will most likely appear when an Oracle process is about to exit normally, or when PMON cleans up a dead process.
