A Mathematical Orchard: Problems and Solutions

The metaphorical title A Mathematical Orchard is supposed to “evoke images of such good things as vigorous growth, thoughtful care, and delectable fruit...” The problems are loosely ordered by difficulty. Earlier problems are generally more difficult than the later ones, but this is not necessarily true for nearly adjacent problems.

The Orchard Hideout is a themed unit about circles that comes from the Interactive Mathematics Program (IMP). The central problem of the unit is about two people who have planted trees in a circular pattern.

Orchard Hideout - Ms. Gonzales' Website

In discrete geometry, the original orchard-planting problem asks for the maximum number of 3-point lines attainable by a configuration of a specific number of points in the plane. It is also called the tree-planting problem or simply the orchard problem. There are also investigations into how many k-point lines there can be. Hallard T. Croft and Paul Erdős proved $t_k > c \cdot n^2 / k^3$, where n is the number of points and t_k is the number of k-point lines. Their construction contains some m-point ...
