Cokeless Cupola A Cost Effective

Therefore melting iron in cupola at low temperature and superheating in an electric furnace is a very cost effective combination. This is called duplexing. In case of duplexing a low bed of around 250 mm is used corresponding to only two rows of spheres which when new are approximately 150 mm in diameter.

Cokeless Cupola - FOUNDRY INFORMATICS CENTRE

The cokeless cupola is an ideal melting unit for the production of ductile iron as well as S.G. iron. It is being adopted worldwide since it can accept a wide variation in the charge materials. An attempt has been made to develop a simplified thermo-chemical model for efficient, eco-friendly and cost effective melting in cokeless cupola.

TECHNICAL PAPER Recent Developments in Cupola Melting

By adopting a modern cokeless cupola plant a foundry can reduce its melting cost at the same time as solving the environmental problem that exists with conventional coke cupolas. The existing charge make-up can often be continued without the need of going to clean high quality materials which are usually recommended for electric melting particularly if they are being installed without emission controls.

A wide variety of metal charges can be melted in the cokeless cupola and generally a similar charge to a conventional coke fired cupola can be used. It has been shown in many instances that much cheaper metal will be obtained from the cokeless cupola compared with other forms of melting.

Relatively low operating costs. Ease of operation. In more recent times, the use of the cupola has declined in favour of electric induction melting, which offers more precise control of melt chemistry and temperature, and much lower levels of emissions.

Cupola furnace: Tapping and tuyere with oxygen lances. The combustion zone is covered by the melting zone, further creating a reduction zone. The use of oxygen is particularly effective when the feed system used allows it to penetrate deeply into the coke bed. This can be attained through addition of oxygen at supersonic speeds.
