Spheres of Influence: The Great Powers Partition in Europe ...

Spheres of influence hadn't gone away; they had been collapsed into one, by the overwhelming fact of U.S. hegemony. Now, however, that hegemony is fading, and Washington has awakened to what it calls "a new era of great-power competition," with China and Russia increasingly using their power to assert interests and values that often conflict with those of the United States.

In international relations (and history), a sphere of influence is a region within one country over which another country claims certain exclusive rights. The degree of control exerted by the foreign power depends on the amount of military force involved in the two countries' interactions, generally.

Learn About Spheres of Influence in Asian History

Yet in reality, a spheres-of-influence world would bring more peril than safety. Russia's and China's spheres of influence would inevitably be domains of coercion and authoritarianism. Both countries are run by illiberal, autocratic regimes; their leaders see democratic values as profoundly threatening to their political survival. If Moscow and Beijing dominated their respective neighborhoods, they would naturally seek to undermine democratic governments that resist their control—as ...

Don't Let Great Powers Carve Up the World | Foreign Affairs

Officials in the Clinton, George W. Bush and Obama administrations often denounced "spheres of influence" as an outdated notion and—more importantly—opposed Russia (first) and China (later) when each nation sought to expand its regional sway, though these policies were decidedly mixed in their results. In 2008, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice avowed that "we will resist any Russian attempt to consign sovereign nations and free peoples to some archaic 'sphere of influence.'".
