Reproductive allocation can then be defined as the fraction of inflorescence and floral meristems, and somatic allocation as the fraction of other meristem types out of all meristems of a plant. If the estimation of proportions of reproductive and vegetative parts is found to be a suitable method to measure reproductive allocation, it may be more straightforward to count meristems than to delimit reproductive and vegetative parts in some other way.

Meristem Allocation as a Means of Assessing Reproductive ...

The reproductive costs hypothesis states that plant resource allocation or development is limited such that an increase in ongoing plant reproduction incurs a reduction in fitness, quantified as reduced future fecundity or survival (Levins, 1968; Karlsson and Méndez, 2005). The main assumption in the hypothesis of reproductive costs is that a trade-off occurs in the distribution of resources at the physiological level, either towards vegetative growth or towards reproduction.
