When I spoke to Krell back then (over 6 years ago), they told me to measure one of the resistors next to the transistors on the heat sink. On the KMA 100, the fan was on the bottom and the heatsink tunnel was on top. The heatsink had 8 transistors (I think) and each had a big black resistor next to it. I am guessing the KSA has TWO fans with TWO heat sinks (one per channel) with 8 transistors ...

Of course the KSA-100 and -200 and the KMA-80 and -160 were superb amplifiers, but there were competitors who gave up very little in the bass region and offered much more harmonic and musical honesty. In this respect, the KSA-250 is a landmark product for Krell; unquestionably their most refined amplifier to date, and possibly the most successful blend of solid-state and vacuum-tube virtues to ...
