Fill In The Blank Plot

My book Fill-in-the-Blank Plotting (Crickhollow Books, 2009) offers advice for writers using my method of plotting fiction. Using two storyboards, you simply fill in the blanks, using the patterns of the Hero's Journey and the Three-Act Structure! This creates a road map for your writing and revising.

Only use fill-in-the-blank questions for testing major points, not specific details. Indicate the units and degree of precision expected. For example, on a math question whose answer is a number of decimal places, make sure that you say how many decimal places you want the student to include.

Creating Effective Fill-in-the-Blank Questions

This is a cloze procedure / fill in the blanks activity based on a synopsis provided by the Royal Shakespeare Company. It is designed to promote close reading and is intended as a revision worksheet for students who have studied the play. It can easily be differentiated by adding additional deletions or by adding additional word options which are not needed e.g. 30 options for 25 deletions.

Ideally the data for fill areas (a background in my case split by a slope), would not be in a spreadsheet. The scatter-plot data points that will be plotted on top, is dynamic and is being updated every minute from a peripheral device. So the values for the fill areas will also be dynamic and need to be updated as well.

Plot holes are nothing more or less than incomplete or incorrect causes and effects. Something happens within the plot that wasn't set up properly or that defies logic. Inevitably, these result from blank spaces within the story—areas you didn't fully explore in order to causally link one part of your story to another that follows.
