Generally speaking, genetic algorithms are simulations of evolution, of what kind ever. In most cases, however, genetic algorithms are nothing else than probabilistic optimization methods which are based on the principles of evolution.

Genetic Algorithms: Theory and Applications

Mutation acts as in classical genetic algorithms, while the fitness-based selection operates through a Gibbs measure (Boltzmann selection). The selective pressure is controlled by a temperature parameter. We provide a mathematical analysis of the convergence of the algorithm, based on the probabilistic theory of large deviations.

Genetic Algorithms have the ability to deliver a “good-enough” solution “fast-enough”. This makes genetic algorithms attractive for use in solving optimization problems. The reasons why GAs are needed are as follows – Solving Difficult Problems. In computer science, there is a large set of problems, which are NP-Hard. What this essentially means is that, even the most powerful computing systems take a very long time (even years!) to solve that problem.
