Guitar Finishing

As the name implies, the highlighted grain/stain finish is a tinted transparent finish that accentuates the grain pattern of your guitar and is sealed with a clear oil finish. In the majority of cases, you should base your choice of finish on the characteristics of the timber your guitar is constructed from or choose the finish you are most interested in beforehand and order your guitar with this in mind.

Here is an overview of the two main finishes used in guitar building as well as their strengths and weaknesses: Lacquer Finishes. Lacquer is a pretty general term that actually describes a few different finishes. Typically, when it comes to guitars, the type of lacquer used is either nitrocellulose or acrylic.

Understanding Guitar Finishes | Humbucker Music

Solvent based polyurethane and NITRO Cellulose lacquers create a dampening filter to the natural resonance, feel and tone of a guitar. These have been the accepted ways to finish guitars since the 1950's and nothing much has changed, largely because they produce thick, consistent looking results, quickly.
