Self Consistency A Theory Of

Self-Consistency Theory was developed by Prescott Lecky in the 1920s and focuses on the importance of the self in the regulation of thoughts and ideas. The basis of this theory proposes that people use self helping measures to maintain constancy (or consistency) of ideas within an individual. Consistency of ideas and representation of the self are integral in humans.

Abstract. We propose a theory for rating financial securities based on a concept of self-consistency, which does not allow issuers to gain, by tranching financial securities, from investors who rely on the rating criterion. While the expected loss criterion used by Moody's satisfies self-consistency, the probability of default criterion used by S&P does not.
