Facet analysis builds classification from 'the bottom up' on the basis of a detailed examination of the concepts in a given discipline or subject field. Concepts are assigned to a series of categories (or facets) which are largely functional, or linguistic in nature (entities, parts, materials, processes, operations, products, agents).

A faceted classification uses semantic categories, either general or subject-specific, that are combined to create the full classification entry. Many library classification systems use a combination of a fixed, enumerative taxonomy of concepts with subordinate facets that further refine the topic.

Faceted classification - Wikipedia

A particular aspect of a subject or train of characteristics. E.g., in literature, there may be four facets: language, form, author, and work. The term is used chiefly by Ranganathan in the colon classification and explained in detail by B.I. Palmer in his book The Fundamentals of Library Science. Ranganathan defined it as the totality of the sub-classes of a basic class derived by the use of a single train of characteristics.

First, let us look at two of the three best-known faceted universal classification systems: the Colon Classification and the second edition of the Bliss Bibliographic Classification (BC2). S.R. Ranganathan's Colon Classification has five facets, now classic (see Ranganathan (1962), among his many books, for an introduction to the facets and how to use them):
