A hand-rod puppet, a style developed by Jim Henson, is a puppet which is controlled by both hands. The puppeteer's dominant hand goes into the head of the puppet, operating the mouth, and at times, facial features. The puppeteer's less dominant hand controls the "arm rods", thin rods connected to the puppet's hand or arms. Arm rods tend to be painted black, and have wooden dowels connected at the bottom for easier grip.

The basic rod puppet is a figure operated by a rod to the head and rods to the hands. A popular variant is a figure whose head is operated by the hand, more like a glove puppet, and whose arms are managed with rods. Jim Henson with his Muppets employed this technique. In many cases Western puppeteers have adopted the rod puppet in this manner, but reduced the number of arm control rods to a single one to reduce technical complexity and allow for greater dramatic expression.
