The Bomb thus becomes a privileged image of historical study for Davis not only as the supreme example of the mathematical/technological mastering of the sublime forces of Nature, but also as another desperate attempt to expunge and annihilate human weakness in the face of those forces, a weakness projected in the Event onto the defenseless civilians of Hiroshima. Only deracination of the sublime logic behind the Bomb, as Davis argues, can explain why it was used in precisely this way, and ...

Deracination: Historicity, Hiroshima, and the Tragic Imperative. A demonstration of how artistic cognition can be used to interrogate and transform a particular discipline — in this case History — thereby liberating a knowledge of its subject which that discipline has thus far been unable to attain. In opening history to the demands of the traumatic and the tragic, a complex psychoanalytic relationship is revealed as the actual condition informing the relationship of historians to their ...

Building on the idea of anti-bildung, Davis's 2001 book Deracination: Historicity, Hiroshima, and the Tragic Imperative takes the historical trauma of the first atomic bombing as the basis for a radically interdisciplinary investigation of trauma generally and of historical discourse in particular, culminating in a chapter that combines psychoanalysis, history and aesthetics to argue for "artistic cognition as a distinct and primary way of knowing."
