Why A Public Anthropology

Public anthropology, according to Robert Borofsky, a professor at Hawaii Pacific University, "demonstrates the ability of anthropology and anthropologists to effectively address problems beyond the discipline—illuminating larger social issues of our times as well as encouraging broad, public conversations about them with the explicit goal of fostering social change". The work of Partners In Health is one illustration of using anthropological methods to solve big or complicated problems.

Public anthropology - Wikipedia

It may generate instead unverified assertions of uncertain value. The book argues that the way for anthropology—or any social science—to realize its potential for serving the common good is to increase transparency and, through such transparency, accountability to the broader society that funds it. By exposing the functions (and dysfunctions) of the academic system to public light, Why a Public Anthropology? hopes to draw the field to effectively address the critical problems that the ...

Why a Public Anthropology ? by Robert Borofsky

"Public anthropology engages issues and audiences beyond today's self-imposed disciplinary boundaries. The focus is on conversations with broad audiences about broad concerns. Public anthropology seeks to address broad critical concerns in ways that others beyond the discipline are able to understand what anthropologists can offer to the re-framing and easing of present-day dilemmas,"

Defining Public Anthropology Public anthropology engages issues and audiences beyond today's self-imposed disciplinary boundaries. The focus is on conversations with broad audiences about broad concerns. Although some anthropologists already engage today's big questions regarding rights, health, violence, governance and justice, many refine narrow (and narrower) problems that concern few (and fewer) people outside the discipline.

To paraphrase Jaffré, where epidemiology can describe priorities, anthropology can define possibilities for action on population health.¹⁸ That is to say, anthropology can provide insight on why public health interventions succeed or fail: the gap between what is planned and what is realised on the ground and the unintended consequences that may result. People do not suffer from pathologies alone, but from a combination of pathology and the social

In contrast, the "public" in public anthropology refers not only to the public concerns we engage, but to our emphasis on openness. Our work is visible to the public and owned by the public. We invite society to participate in big conversations and are held accountable to the people we serve.
