First, there is a desire to manipulate the overall composition of the harvested parts of plants in nutritionally and commercially useful ways. Starch is a major component of many of these harvested parts, and an understanding of the regulation of its accumulation will aid attempts to make directed changes in composition.

Proteins catalysing the addition of many of the linkages in xylan have recently been identified. Xylan biosynthesis involves a terminal oligosaccharide at the reducing end which might act as a primer or terminator (York and O'Neill, 2008). This oligosaccharide is not found in xylan from all plant species and consequently it is unclear whether it is essential for xylan synthesis, or whether in some species the oligosaccharide could be removed from the mature xylan.

Introduction Plants synthesise a huge variety of fatty acids although only a few are major and common constituents. Broadly speaking, long-chain fatty acids are synthesised de novo from small precursors ultimately derived from photosynthate. Two enzyme systems are utilised, acetyl-CoA carboxylase and fatty acid synthase (Fig. 1).
