Jackendoff proposes a physiological basis for language in a specialized area of the brain, which can be identified even though its organization is still a mystery. He then extends these principles of universal grammar and innate knowledge to the understanding of music, visual signs, and, most challenging, social interaction. Meaning is ``constructed" by the innate patterns of the auditor as well as by the speaker, he says, and, by extension, human

The article was based on some research in Israel which showed that people who are good at recognizing patterns in mathematics will also be good in learning languages; in other words, the ability to recognize patterns. Not specifically language-related patterns, but the ability to recognize patterns is what makes people good language learners.
