Gravitational Lensing Of Gravitational Waves

if there is a gravitational lens on their way. Apart from the magnification of the amplitudes and the time delay between the gravitational wave rays, gravitational lensing also rotates their polarization planes and causes the gravitational wave Faraday rotation. The effect of the Faraday rotation is weak and can be ignored.

In principle, gravitational lensing of gravitational waves (GWs) should occur in the same way as it does for light (Thorne 1987). However, there are some key differences that can potentially favor the observation of such lensing over that of light. The most obvious difference is that dust clouds and noise are not a factor.

Gravitational Lensing of Gravitational Waves

Apart from the magnification of the amplitudes and the time delay between the gravitational wave rays, gravitational lensing also rotates their polarization planes. This results in the changes in the antenna pattern function, which describes the response of the detector to its relative orientation to the gravitational wave.

A gravitational lens is a distribution of matter between a distant light source and an observer, that is capable of bending the light from the source as the light travels towards the observer. This effect is known as gravitational lensing, and the amount of bending is one of the predictions of Albert Einstein's general theory of relativity. Although Einstein made unpublished calculations on the subject in 1912, Orest Khvolson and Frantisek Link are generally credited with being the first to disc
