The informal states analyzed in this study are often viewed as puppets of their powerful sponsors. Indeed, as seen in previous chapters which addressed issues of security and symbolic settings as well as political and economic developments, Turkey and Russia do play a prominent role in the creation of these informal states.

The 'informal state' is manifest in the construction of structures parallel to the legal and constitutional ones. This article departs from other studies of stateness in Africa that accent colonial legacies, illicit economic activities, and social conflict in accounting for the so called 'African state' that supposedly fails to approximate to the model (modern) state.
