As the benefit level that can be informally enforced by the family falls, it may become optimal for the state to intervene and take over responsibility for social insurance provision from the family. But if strong family ties exist naturally, the state's best response is to keep these ties (with the associated gains from monitoring of individual behaviour by peers) and opt out of welfare provision altogether.

Political scientist Eileen McDonagh has argued that a major determinant of where welfare states arose is whether or not a country had a historical monarchy with familial foundations (a trait that Max Weber called patrimonialism); in places where the monarchic state was viewed as a parental steward of the populace, it was easier to shift into a mindset where the industrial state could also serve as a parental steward of the populace.
