Abstract. Powerful femtosecond laser pulses propagate in an apparent form of filamentation in all transparent optical media. This universal nonlinear phenomenon is currently an interesting topic of research at the forefront of applied physics and attracts more and more people to enter this field. This paper attempts to clarify some of the fundamental physics behind filamentation.

Some Fundamental Concepts of Femtosecond Laser Filamentation

Abstract. In this chapter, we demonstrate experimental characterizations of plasma of different phase targets induced by femtosecond laser filamentation using optical emission spectroscopy and present an interesting phenomenon of lasing actions occurring in the plasma column in air due to two different mechanisms, i.e., amplified spontaneous emission and self-generated harmonic seeding lasing.

About this book. About this book. This book is focused on the nonlinear theoretical and mathematical problems associated with ultrafast intense laser pulse propagation in gases and in particular, in air. With the aim of understanding the physics of filamentation in gases, solids, the atmosphere, and even biological tissue, specialists in nonlinear optics and filamentation from both physics and mathematics attempt to rigorously derive and analyze relevant non-perturbative models.

When a powerful femtosecond laser pulse propagates in a transparent optical medium, be it a gas or a condensed medium, the pulse will self-focus into a series of self-foci, giving rise to the perception of a filament.
