To disperse two immiscible liquids, one needs a third component, namely, the emulsifier. The choice of the emulsifier is crucial in the formation of the emulsion and its long-term stability [1-3]. Emulsions may be classified according to the nature of the emulsifier or the structure of the system. This is illustrated in Table 1.1.

Emulsions - Formation, Stability, Industrial Applications ...

Emulsion Stability The process by which an emulsion coalesces (completely breaks i.e., the system separates into bulk oil and water phases), is generally considered to be governed by four different droplet loss mechanisms: Brownian locculation, creaming, sedimentation locculation, and disproportionation, shown schematically in Figure 1. The first three are the primary methods by which emulsions are destabilized, though all

Emulsion Stability and Testing

1.1 Emulsion formation and stability When the immiscible phases of an emulsion are mixed, they generally separate, as this is the most thermodynamically stable state. Thus, in order to mix the liquids, a mechanical force is required to combine the two phases into an emulsion. Often a two-step process, emulsion

Introduction to Emulsion Technology, Emulsifiers and Stability

Formation and stability of emulsions is one of the important topics in the field of colloids and interfacial science. Surfactants and colloidal particles are often used to stabilize emulsions.

Surfactants are amphiphilic molecules; they minimize the energy required for the emulsion formation by reducing oil-water interfacial tension.

The stability of Pickering emulsions can also be enhanced by the formation of a three-dimensional viscoelastic network of colloidal particles in the continuous phase. This stabilization mechanism relies on their being a sufficiently high concentration of non-adsorbed protein particles in the continuous phase, as well as appropriately attractive force acting between them.

The book explains how to predict emulsion stability and determine droplet sizes in a variety of emulsion systems. It discusses spontaneous emulsification and the formation of "nanoemulsions" as well as droplet-droplet interactions in different electrical fields (electrocoalescence), and the formulation, composition, and preparation variables that contribute to the inversion in emulsion systems.
