The redshift is the ratio of the change in the wavelength of a spectral line divided by its wavelength measured in the lab, and this is equal to the speed of the object (star or galaxy) divided by the speed of light. Since nothing can travel faster than the speed of light, one would not expect the redshift to be greater than 1.

Hubble, with the help of Humason, painstakingly measured the distances of the nearest galaxies, and by 1928, was able to state that the radial velocity determined from the redshift in the spectrum of a galaxy was directly proportional to the distance to that galaxy (except for those in the Local Group). This can be written as $V_r = H_0 d$ Where the radial velocity. V_r is measured in km/sec, H_0 is the ...
