Endocrine System And Selected Metabolic

Abstract. Endocrine system is comprised of multiple glands. All of these glands secrete different hormones into the body. Most of the body's functions, i.e., metabolism, growth, development, electrolyte balance, and reproduction, are regulated by these endocrine hormones. Numerous releasing and inhibitory hormones are secreted by the hypothalamus which eventually stimulates the pituitary gland's hormonal secretions.

Last Modified Date: October 17, 2020. The endocrine system affects nearly every cell and organ in the body. It is made up of glands that release chemicals to control many bodily functions, including cell growth and development, mood, sexual functions, and metabolism, the process of converting fuel from foods into energy for the body to function. Although the endocrine system is comprised of many glands, all of which work together, it is the thyroid gland that directly effects metabolism.
