The Dielectric Barrier Discharge Detector. Principles of the Dielectric Barrier Discharge: Advanced Industrial Chemistry (A.I.C.) detectors are based on the use of a dielectric barrier discharge (D.B.D.). A D.B.D. is a plasma discharge that is obtained using a high voltage alternating current applied to a dielectric material like glass or pyrex. The application of high voltage to a gas results in a breakdown in the gas and, subsequently, a discharge from one electrode to the other.

Shimadzu Barrier Discharge Ionization Detector (BID) The BID uses low-energy plasma that is generated by a dielectric barrier discharge (as opposed to heat) to detect analytes with a lower ionization potential than that of helium (17.7 eV). All analytes have an ionization potential lower than that of helium with the exception of neon.

The dielectric barrier discharge detector, a new highly sensitive detector with tunable selectivity, has been innovated and commercialized. The principle of operation of the detector, along with critical challenging industrial applications such as the analysis of oxygenated compounds, sulfur containing compounds, and other compounds of industrial significance are presented in [85] as a non-selective detector.

Dielectric-barrier discharge (DBD) is the electrical discharge between two electrodes separated by an insulating dielectric barrier. Originally called silent (inaudible) discharge and also known as ozone production discharge or partial discharge, it was first reported by Ernst Werner von Siemens in 1857. On right, the schematic diagram shows a typical construction of a DBD wherein one of the two electrodes is covered with a dielectric barrier material.

Dielectric barrier discharge - Wikipedia

A dielectric barrier discharge is a plasma discharge that is obtained using a high voltage alternating current applied to a gas such as Helium or Argon as it flows through a dielectric material such as quartz glass. Two electrodes are arranged within the detector so that when the high voltage is applied to the gas, a breakdown

Advanced Industrial Chemistry Corporation has developed a patented detector based on the use of the dielectric barrier discharge plasma source. The detector consists of a stainless steel body 1 ½ inches in diameter and 4 inches tall. There is a hole in the center of the main

White paper on the Dielectric Barrier Discharge Detectors.

The detector uses an electrical discharge in helium to generate high energy UV photons and metastable helium which ionizes all compounds except helium. The ions produce an electric current, which is the signal output of the detector. The greater the concentration of the component, the more ions are produced, and the greater the current.
