Some of the most common pumps used for mine dewatering are submersible centrifugal pumps (pump and motor in one unit, all submerged underwater), submersible turbines (pump and motor installed in a well or cooling sleeve and submerged), and vertical turbines, either installed on a float in a pond/lake or in a well (pump end and column pipe submerged with motor mounted on a motor stool above ground/water).

Selecting Pumps for Mining Applications | Pumps & Systems

A centrifugal pump utilizes rotation to pass on velocity in the direction of the fluid. Each centrifugal pump uses a hydraulic component like an impeller that turns to pass on velocity toward the pumped fluid. This pump mainly used to change the velocity into liquid flow. Each pump uses a hydraulic component like a casing that captures the velocity which is informed by the impeller & directs the pushed fluid toward the pump expulsion end.
