Major areas of focus are transcriptional and epigenetic switches and the activity of genetic networks in cell differentiation, the role of signaling pathways, and tissue modeling and organ formation. Another is the translation of basic knowledge of developmental processes into the fields of stem cell biology and regenerative medicine.

Pioneering examples include engineered mammalian cells that harbor specific transcription-based switches to restore glucose homeostasis in mice by regulating glucagon-like peptide-1 (GLP-1)/insulin expression using remote input signals, such as blue-light (Figure 2a) 39, 50 or radiowave-heated nanoparticles (Figure 2b) . Self-sustained prosthetic gene networks enable control of transgene expression independent of external signals but according to disease-relevant metabolites.
