XML does not require a DTD. When you are experimenting with

XML, or when you are working with small XML files, creating DTDs may be a waste of time. If you develop applications, wait until the specification is stable before you add a DTD. Otherwise, your software might stop working because of validation errors.

Note that the XML examples below don't encode the data type (e.g. that age is a number), and would need something like a schema to encode the same information as the JSON example above does as is. Note that since XML tag names cannot contain spaces (in contrast to JSON and YAML keys), another naming convention has to be used to represent the JSON keys (in this example the tags are in camelCase).
