STEP 1. Get students working in pairs. Pair them up with someone at their desk, a usual partner, someone that they choose, or use numbers/cut up pictures to pair them (hand out cards with numbers on – two of each number – when students come in, then ask them to find the student with the same number). STEP 2.

Powerpoints are usually teacher-fronted and can be boring, especially if they have a lot of text on them. Go to a conference, observe how presenters use powerpoint etc, and reflect on what engages and what doesn't. Powerpoint is useful for reducing paper waste, but it's more effective for images than text on the whole.
