Bitcoin was the first blockchain to implement PoW (known as Hashcash) as a consensus algorithm. Bitcoin miners run a computer program which gives each miner an equal chance proportional to their computing power to discover the solution to the next block. They compete to find the answer (known as hash) to the set PoW parameters for that block. This hash is a 64-character long answer, and is based upon the inputs to the block, such as the transactions it contains.
