The requirements for addressing risks and opportunities are spread throughout the ISO 9001:2015 standard, starting at the beginning in section 4.4.1, where the organization is required to determine the processes needed to address risks and opportunities that are determined. This is reinforced in section 5.1.2, where top management needs to ensure that risks and opportunities that affect product and service conformity are determined and addressed.

ISO 9001:2015 - How to address risks and opportunities

Risk-based thinking is a key concept that underpins ISO 9001:2015. It may seem new but risk-based thinking has always been implicit in ISO 9001, and it is something many organisations do already. References to “preventative action” have been removed but the idea of identifying and addressing potential mistakes before they happen very much remains. The revised standard requires an organisation to determine the risks and opportunities to processes, products and services, as well as to the ...
