A deep convolutional GAN (DCGAN) is developed for large data-driven fluid modelling. First use of DCGANs for predicting spatio-temporal nonlinear fluid flows. Predictive results from DCGAN and high fidelity model are in a good agreement. Using DCGAN the computational cost is reduced by five orders of magnitude.

The data generated by DSMC are utilized to derive the underlying governing equations using a sparse regression method proposed recently. We demonstrate that this strategy is capable of deriving a variety of equations in fluid dynamics, such as the momentum equation, diffusion equation, Fokker-Planck equation and vorticity transport equation.

This paper presents a novel generative model to synthesize fluid simulations from a set of reduced parameters. A convolutional neural network is trained on a collection of discrete, parameterizable fluid simulation velocity fields. Due to the capability of deep learning architectures to learn representative features of the data, our generative model is able to accurately approximate the training data set, while providing plausible interpolated in-betweens.
