ASTM D2698 is another test method that can be used for most solvent-reducible paints. Although it is commonly used to test paints with lighter pigments that may not settle during the centrifuge process used in ASTM D2371, it should not be used for paints with pigments that tend to bleed severely, or pigments that are very difficult to centrifuge (like carbon black). This method uses a high-speed centrifuge or ultracentrifuge to separate the pigment from the vehicle.
