Mucus Hypersecretion In Respiratory Disease

A number of chronic respiratory diseases including chronic bronchitis, asthma, cystic fibrosis and bronchiectasis are characterized by mucus hypersecretion. Following damage to the airway epithelium, a repair process of dedifferentiation, regenerative proliferation and redifferentiation takes place that is invariably accompanied by mucus hypersecretion as a key element in the host defence mechanism.

Abstract. Asthma, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, and cystic fibrosis are three chronic pulmonary diseases that affect an estimated 420 million individuals across the globe. A key factor contributing to each of these conditions is mucus hypersecretion. Although management of these diseases is vastly studied, researchers have only begun to scratch the surface of the mechanisms contributing to mucus hypersecretion.

This study was the first to establish a link between SHP-1 and mucus hypersecretion in respiratory diseases. Taking these mechanisms into account, it can be postulated that overactivation of STAT3 by hypermethylation and subsequent suppression of SHP-1 may lead to increased MUC gene expression in respiratory conditions. 5-Aza could be used in these patients to reactivate SHP-1 via ...

Mucus production, secretion and clearance are considered to play a critical role in maintenance of airway health, however in diseases such as COPD, epidemiological and pathological studies suggest that excess mucus contributes to airway plugging and decline in lung health. The airway surface epithelium is composed of a heterogeneous mix of cell types one of which, the goblet cell, is dedicated to the production of secretory gel-forming mucins.

Airway mucus hypersecretion can obstruct the respiratory tract lumen, limit airflow, and accelerate decline in lung function.¹²²⁶ At the same time, inflammatory responses compromise mucus clearance by cilia, remove alveolar surface active substances such as surfactants, and alter biophysical properties of mucus.¹³ This can lead to recurrent airway infection, causing further airway obstruction and remodeling, thereby creating a vicious cycle.

Obstructive lung diseases often result from impaired mucociliary clearance that can be associated with mucus hypersecretion, and these are sometimes referred to as mucoobstructive lung diseases. Techniques of airway clearance therapy can help to clear secretions, maintain respiratory health, and prevent inflammation in the airways.
